Gandhiji never considered lawyers profession as a liar's profession. He had no intention of earning either position or money by lying.

His principle to the adherence of truth was put to test many times. He knew that if only he encouraged his client or his witness to lie then he could win the case. He always resisted temptation. In his heart of hearts he always wished that he should win if his client's case was right. He warned every new client at the outset that he should not expect him to take up a false case or to coach the witness. As a result of this he built up such a reputation that no false case came to him.
